

A NOTE TO THE READER

This book is a neopulp.

A neopulp is a book a person created, shaped and judged — and a machine wrote with them, draft after draft. It wasn't dictated. It was argued into existence: the author brought the premise, the machine brought back something unexpected, the author pushed and cut and pushed again, until something existed that neither would have made alone. The author is the one who takes responsibility for it: I created this, I shaped it, I judged it, and I stand behind it.

For all of history, the creative economy selected for ideas worth the cost of making. Every medium charged a price for trying the idea that probably wouldn't work, so most of those ideas were never tried. The strange book stayed a note in a drawer. That price just collapsed. Now we can select for ideas worth making — and when experimentation gets cheap, creativity becomes play again. The old pulps knew what to do with cheap: wild premises, new writers, another one next month. Pulp democratized publishing. Neopulp democratizes experimentation.

Good work, in any medium, by any means, is a concentrated form of intention. That is what the mark on this book certifies: not that a human typed it, but that a human created it, shaped it, judged it, and wouldn't sign it until every word was one they'd stand behind. It says so on the title page, at byline scale, without hedging, because a new medium is nothing to apologize for. It never was. Ask the camera.

A book isn't good because a human wrote every word, and it isn't bad because a machine wrote any of them. Judge the work first. The means of creation are not the measure of it. You will decide.

A human vision, perfected.
