This book is a neopulp.

A neopulp is a book a person imagined and directed, and a machine wrote at their instruction. The vision, the taste, the judgment of what stays and what goes — those are the author's. The sentences are the machine's. The idea is the authorship. It always was.

For all of history, most creativity died in the gap between conceiving a thing and being able to make it. The vision was there; the ten thousand hours were not.

Having the idea and writing it down were one job, so books belonged to the people with the hours, not the people with the ideas. That gap just closed. The machine frees the imagination from the work of execution. What's left was always the human part and always the hard part: the idea, the taste, the direction, the nerve to follow one vision all the way to the end. This is not the death of creativity. It's the release of it.

Anyone can now write anything and put it anywhere — and most ideas suck. That is what the mark is for. In a flood of infinite books, it tells you that a person initiated this one, directed it, understood what they were making, and aimed at something good. It says so on the title page, at byline scale, without hedging, because a new medium is nothing to apologize for. It never was. Ask the camera.

A book isn't good because a human wrote every word, and it isn't bad because a machine wrote any of them. A book is good or it isn't. You will decide.

A human vision, perfected.
